

One of the highlights of my Traditional Latin Mass pilgrimage to Fatima for the Centennial Year was leading my group on the monumental outdoor Stations of the Cross. They wind through the olive and cork trees of the Fatima countryside once frequented by the three Shepherd Children and their flock.

The Stations (Via Sacra) begin at the Roundabout of St. Teresa of Ourem (aka: Rotunda Sul), located where there was a pond of dirty water in 1917. It was at this pond, used to water their sheep, that Jacinta, Francisco and Lucia themselves drank from, in a spirit of reparation for sins. Along this Via Dolorosa, there are signs pointing to nearby points of interest, including Valinhos, Aljustrel, and the Loca do Cabeco.

Easily overlooked by most Fatima pilgrims are the small plaques in a seldom seen foreign language affixed to the base of each Station. Inscribed thereon are the names and places of the donor for each Station. These donors represent Hungarians of the "free-world" who, between 1959 and 1962, erected this impressive display as an expression of prayer for the fall of atheistic Communism in Hungary.

To add a deeper level of appreciation for these "Hungarian Stations of the Cross" at Fatima, I now provide you with the details and reflections for the plaques mounted to each Station. Few have ever pondered these markers written in Hungarian since few would even attempt to translate this difficult language while meditating on Our Divine Lord Jesus Christ's Passion and Death.

Commemorating what they did

London Rosary Sodality and all living Hungarians in the world

This is a commemoration of the leaders of the Hungarian Revolution against the Soviet Union from October 23 to November 10, 1956. The Hungarian flag, with a hole where the Communist symbol had been cut out, became the banner of the Revolution. A large Soviet force put down the Revolution with over 2,500 Hungarians and 700 Communist troops being killed in the conflict. Some 200,000 Hungarians fled their homeland at that time as refugees.

In regards to this plaque's reference to London, the United Kingdom presently has the 9th largest number of Hungarians within its borders, numbering some 52,000. However, the formation of the European Union in 2004 had doubled the number of Hungarians in the UK, with most seeking employment opportunities in London.

'15th Station': THE RESURRECTION

In Gratitude for the Resurrection of Hungary

The Parish Priest and his congregation

Lajosmizse, Hungary

October 13, 1992

Traditionally, the Church has only recognized fourteen (14) Stations of the Cross.

However, the pilgrim to Fatima will notice that there is an additional Station more recently added.

On the 75th Anniversary of the Miracle of the Sun, on October 13, 1992, Hungarians living in Hungary made a very special journey to Fatima. On that day, they dedicated the newly constructed 15th Station of the Cross, 'the Resurrection,' which they themselves had funded. Led by their own Catholic bishops and priests, and accompanied by the Hungarian Ambassador to Portugal, these long-suffering, and now 'free' Hungarian faithful came to Fatima to give thanks for their nation's 'resurrection from the death' of atheistic Communism.
